

Reviews – Cover Endorsements for Environmental Leadership in Developing Countries

“This is a hopeful and inspiring contribution to the understanding of global conversation.”

E.O. Wilson, Harvard University

“Paul Steinberg’s wonderfully detailed assessment of environmental leadership in Bolivia and Costa Rica is not simply an inspiring story of how enlightened conservationists can succeed against frequently daunting odds, but also a highly insightful analysis of how this can be done. By demonstrating the close links between domestic and international environmental leaders, the book demolishes the misleading myth that conservation is the ‘foreigner’s agenda.’”

William Asher, Donald C. McKenna Professor of Government and Economics, Claremont McKenna College

“This book exemplifies careful methodological attention to the political mechanisms of policy change and provides important lessons for the foundation of effective sustainable development practices in developing countries.”

Peter M. Hass, Department of Political Science, University of Massachusetts, Amherst

“This is an unusually interesting approach to the subject that receives too little attention and a notable account of a largely undisclosed history. It will be a very significant contribution to the field.”

Michael Redclift, Department of Geography, King’s College London